MISCELLANEOUS READING. PEAR BLIGHTS.

The following, which we find in the Columbus Times and Sentinel, is a matter of no small interest to our borticultural friends, and to the public generally: "A disease or an insect too small for microscropic vision, is destroying many of our finest fruit trees and causing some alarm among the cultivators of orchards. For a long time, the disease or destroying insect was confined to a northern climate, but it is now transferred to a southern soil and threatens great destruction. The finest pear trees wither and die in a few days. We are informed by our friend, R. J. Moses, e-q., of this city, who has the finest orchards in the country on Esquiline Hill, that the symptoms of decay are first observed at the ends of the leaves, which soon turn black and the blossoms fade. Its progression is downward towards the roots. It is beyond doubt contagious and spreads rapidly. The best remedy is to lop off the limbs of the trees when its leaves are being tinctured with blackness, or cut the tree down immediately and burn it, so as to destroy the insects."
